The aims and objectives of the comparative study Domestic Violence among Inuit in Alaska, Canada and Greenland are to describe, and compare men's violence against women. The analyses are to compare masculine practices related to violence, social conditions, social relations, understandings and concepts of violence against women, the societal reactions to as well as attitudes and actions for the prevention of violence against women in Alaska, Canada and Greenland.

The purpose of the research is to gain knowledge and create understanding of conditions of relevance to men's violence against women, in the different welfare states regimes among people with similar cultural background.

Gender and violence is often analysed from the women's perspective. In this project the focus is on men, masculinity, and men's power and practices. The method used in gathering information on men's violence and masculinities is qualitative analyses of the narratives of violence.
